Reading — The Clockmaker's Gift

Conor lived above his grandfather's tiny clock shop on a narrow street in the old part of the city. The shop was crowded with hundreds of clocks — tall grandfather clocks, delicate silver watches, and cuckoo clocks that burst into song on the hour. Conor loved the gentle ticking that filled every room like a heartbeat.

One grey morning, his grandfather called him downstairs. On the workbench sat a small wooden clock, its face cracked and its hands frozen. "This clock stopped fifty years ago," the old man said. "Nobody has been able to mend it. I want you to try."

Conor felt a flutter of doubt. He was only eleven, and the clock's insides were a tangle of tiny wheels and springs. But he pulled up a stool, picked up the smallest screwdriver, and began.

For three long evenings he worked by candlelight, cleaning each part and fitting them back together. His fingers ached and his eyes grew tired, but he refused to give up. On the third night, he tightened one last spring and held his breath.

Tick. Tick. Tick. The old clock came alive in his hands. Its hands began to move, and a soft chime rang out across the silent shop. His grandfather appeared in the doorway, his eyes shining. "I knew you could do it," he whispered. "That clock belonged to your great-grandmother. Now it belongs to you."

Conor held the little clock close. It was not the grandest clock in the shop, nor the most valuable, but to him it was priceless. He had given it back its voice.
